The Boce W. Barlow, Jr., House is located in the Blue Hills section in the northwest corner of Hartford, an early twentieth-century residential neighborhood. It is bounded by Keney Park on the east and Albany Avenue on the south and extends into neighboring Town of Bloomfield on the north. Canterbury Street runs parallel to and is a block west of Blue Hills Avenue, the principal artery of this neighborhood. Ridgefield Avenue, which borders Keney Park, is one block east of Canterbury Street.

The 1926 Barlow House is one of a number of similar houses in this subdivision, which was laid out in the 1920s. Uniformly set back from the street on relatively small lots, the houses here were all designed in the Colonial Revival style and are generally two stories in height. Stylistic variety in the neighborhood is achieved by the use of several facade designs and roof types, which are repeated at random along Canterbury Street. All designed within the broad stylistic range of the Colonial Revival, these variations are generally limited to different treatments of the main entrance and the arrangement of the facade fenestration.

Like most of its neighbors, the Barlow House is rectangular in plan (34’ x 29’) with a gabled roof that has a ridge-to-street orientation (Photograph #s 1, 2, 3). The main block has a three-bay facade, with paired windows flanking a central doorway. The entrance is sheltered by a pedimented hood supported by large wooden brackets with pendant drops. With the exception of the casement windows in the small integral hipped-roof wing on the south elevation, most of the windows contain one-over-one double-hung sash. Changes to the house over time have been minimal. They include the installation of aluminum siding and an access ramp at the main entrance. At the rear of the property in the northwest corner, there is a two-car garage built about 1936.

The comfortable interior has a center-hall plan with the living room to the left (Photograph #4). A brick fireplace with a wooden mantel is located on its south wall. The stairs, which rise on the left side of the entrance hall, have a simple balustrade that terminates in a square panelled newel post (Photograph #5). The wood trim around doors and windows retains its original stain and varnished finish throughout the first floor. The second floor was not viewed by the consultant.
The Boce W. Barlow, Jr., House is primarily significant as the home of a prominent leader of the black community in Hartford. During his long and distinguished career, which spans the full progressive sweep of twentieth-century black history, Boce W. Barlow, Jr. (1915 - ), has had an impressive record of public service. As a lawyer, prosecutor, and judge, he worked for equal justice and assisted in the writing of Connecticut's pioneering civil rights laws. A practicing attorney in Hartford for almost 40 years, Barlow was the first African-American in the Connecticut judiciary and the first to be elected a state senator. Among his important accomplishments in the senate was the sponsorship of legislation which resulted in the creation of the Department of Community Affairs and the Department of Corrections.

Historical Significance

The career of Boce W. Barlow, Jr., is a microcosm of the experience of twentieth-century black leadership nationwide. Although discrimination still exists and the full promise of the civil rights movement is yet to be realized, during his lifetime in Hartford, Barlow has been a part of the major social and political reforms that have opened doors for the black community and brought them full citizenship status. Barlow grew up in a period when blacks were a decided minority in the city and there were no public role models to emulate. There was only one black teacher in the public schools, no minority participation in the fire or police departments, and no elected black officials. Although most black leaders were educated as ministers, Barlow chose the law as a profession, succeeding brilliantly against overwhelming odds and demonstrating to the black community the value of education.

Barlow entered politics when Connecticut's major cities were in crisis. Decades of large-scale immigration and industrialization had produced overcrowding and poor housing conditions, especially for minorities. A political moderate, Barlow believed that the black community would be best served by improving the quality of life for everyone in an integrated multi-racial city, and he worked with the Democratic party leadership to develop effective political coalitions. During his tenure as a state senator he "earned the respect of his white colleagues by the sheer force of his intellect and humanity." 1 In 1987, in recognition of his many achievements in a lifetime of public service, the city named a street in his honor, Boce Barlow Way in the North Meadows.

Born in Americus, Georgia, in 1915, Barlow came to Hartford with his family the following year. Like many African-Americans in this period, his father, Boce Barlow, Sr., came North seeking employment opportunities, part of the first wave of emigration from the Deep South. Many of these first emigrants were farm laborers or migrant tobacco workers. At that time, although there was a small stable black community with its own church that dated back to was the early nineteenth century, there were fewer than 2000 blacks in Hartford, a city that already had a large European immigrant population. The Barlow family first lived in an ethnic neighborhood near the waterfront, parts of which were leveled in the 1950s for the construction of Constitution Plaza, but soon moved to the North End, where Boce Barlow, Sr., opened a small restaurant and ice cream parlor on Bellevue Street. A close friend of Thomas
J. Spellacy, then the mayor of Hartford, the senior Barlow was active in the Democratic party and many political meetings were held in his home.

Educated in Hartford's public schools, Boce Barlow, Jr., graduated in 1933 from Hartford High School, where he had been enrolled in the college preparatory program. He attended Howard University in Washington, D.C., one of the leading black institutions of higher learning. Although he worked nights to finance his education, Barlow was elected president of his senior class and graduated cum laude in 1939. Between 1943 and 1946 he served in the U.S. Army and saw action in New Guinea in the Pacific theater. Soon after he returned home, Barlow married Catherine Swanson of Danville, Virginia, whom he had met at Howard University. Accepted by Harvard Law School, where he was one of only four African-Americans in a class of 600, Barlow and his new bride moved to Boston, where they lived until he received his law degree in 1949. Admitted to the Connecticut bar that year, he soon established a law practice at 721 Main Street in Hartford. Within a few years he was appointed prosecutor and, in 1957, judge of Hartford’s municipal court. He later served as a hearing examiner for Connecticut’s Civil Rights Commission, which had been established in 1943, and on the Board of Directors of Connecticut State Prisons. Until his retirement, Barlow practiced law at new offices at 750 Main Street, where he was in partnership with Attorney Paul Lewis, Hartford’s corporation counsel. In 1958 Barlow and his wife moved to Canterbury Street with their two young children, Cathy and Bryon, where they were the first minority family in the neighborhood and faced considerable prejudice. Mrs. Barlow, who has worked in the Hartford schools for 30 years as a teacher, guidance counselor, and administrator, has a master’s degree from the University of Chicago.

Like his father before him, Barlow has been active in Hartford politics for most of his adult life. He has worked for the Democratic party since the late 1930s, a period when most African-Americans were still staunchly Republican, the party of Lincoln, and still a small urban minority. However, when Barlow campaigned through the state with Adlai Stevenson during the latter’s presidential run in 1952, blacks were becoming a substantial presence in Connecticut’s major cities. In Hartford the African-American population had grown from 12,000 in 1940 to 44,000 by 1960 to become the largest single minority or ethnic group in the city. When the African-American community in Hartford grew large enough to be a political force, Barlow worked to assure its representation at the state level, serving as a mentor to young black leaders and encouraging them to run for elective office. Although Barlow was content to be a political organizer from behind the scenes for almost 20 years, in 1966 he felt compelled to challenge the Democratic party incumbent in the 2nd senatorial district to broaden the base of black representation. After winning the primary, Barlow was elected a state senator and served two-terms, from 1966 to 1970. In his second term, he was the party’s endorsed candidate.

2. Although there are no minority representation figures available, it is assumed that at that time there were very few black attorneys in the state.
